those who have sought information on the extent of divorce in the modern world will know that the most accessible sources lie in international yearbooks 1 and that from these it is possible to make certain broad comparisons of a historical or geographical kind for any one country for instance changes in the divorce rate can be traced or comparative rates for any number of countries at any given time can be examined similarly it is possible to discover differences and similarities in divorce trends on an international basis either for individual nations or for regional or cultural clusters typically however such sources cannot be used for detailed or sophisticated comparisons because of the limited volume of data and of the nature of the statistics presented to detect detailed differences in divorce propensity by time or place for instance ideally requires cohort data information on the number of marriages dissolved by divorce within one two x years among every 1 000 or 10 000 of marriages contracted in a given year such data do not appear in the international statistical summaries which often do not even use the next best kind of measure namely divorces per 1 000 or 10 000 existing marriages often the figures given are those for divorces per thousand of tot a i population and these are of little comparative value because of variations in popu lation structure
