how the armies of Rome mastered the nations of the world is known to every reader of history but the story of the conquest by Latin of the languages of the world is vague in the minds of most of us if we should ask ourselves how it came about we should probably think of the world wide supremacy of Latin as a natural result of the world wide supremacy of the Roman legions or of Roman law but in making this assumption we should be shutting our eyes to the history of our own times a conquered people does not necessarily accept perhaps it has not commonly accepted the tongue of its master in his ancient and modern imperialism Lord Cromer states that in India only one hundred people in every ten thousand can read and write English and this condition exists after an occupation of one hundred and fifty years or more he adds there does not appear the least prospect of French supplanting Arabic in Algeria in comparing the results of ancient and modern methods perhaps he should have taken into account the fact that India and Algeria have literatures of their own which most of the outlying peoples subdued by rome did not have and these literatures may have strengthened the resistance which the tongue of the conquered people has offered to that of the conqueror but even when allowance is made for this fact the difference in resultant conditions is surprising from its narrow confines within a little district on the banks of the tiber covering at the close of the fifth century b c less than a hundred square miles latin spread through italy and the islands of the mediterranean through france spain england northern africa and the danubian provinces triumphing over all the other tongues of those regions more completely than roman arms triumphed over the peoples using them in tracing the story we must keep in our mind s eye the linguistic geography of italy just as we must remember the political geography of the peninsula in following rome s territorial expansion let us think at the outset then of a little strip of flat country on the tiber dotted here and there with hills crowned with villages such hill towns were rome tusculum and praeneste for instance each of them was the stronghold and market place of the country immediately about it and therefore had a life of its own so that although latin was spoken in all of them it varied from one to the other this is shown clearly enough by the inscriptions which have been found on the sites of these ancient towns and as late as the close of the third century before our era plautus pokes fun in his comedies at the provincialism of praeneste
